The world of Codes

6-Differences A and B encodings

As mentioned, currently there are various machines in use by the major collectors and sellers of the sector, with similar functioning, but which return different class and emission codes.

The "content" of the codes is the same. The difference lies in their numerical representation. We are aware of other less common types of representation, which will not be discussed in this publication.

Knowing the technology behind the magnetic track, we were able to achieve the conversion between the two most popular encodings.
